THE SPACE BETWEEN

I love to go outside, on a clear summer night, and look up into the sky. Just looking at what is beyond my ability to touch reminds me of the indescribable infinity that endlessly unfolds just outside my reach. The grandeur of space holds so much wisdom, but it won't be found in the twinkling stars, planets, moons and other such objects that catch my eye. The greatest wisdom is located in the space between. While my eye is trained to seek out objects to identify and classify, it is the uncontained vastness which cannot be named that is most fascinating. In the "no-thingness" we call space, we find All That Is. It is the awareness of the space around things that defines every thing.

When I teach Sunday school classes, I often begin by having the students describe an object in the room...for example, a table. They sometimes describe it by color and texture, but almost always they include that it is solid in form.

"What if that isn't true?" I ask them.

I go on to explain that when magnified, the object would appear to be mostly space...not energy/photons. It is composed primarily of space between...not the solid, wooden form they see. And then, we discuss what might be in the space between. Is space really a thing, or is it the background Beingness that gives things a canvas to paint upon?

I also point out to them that although they look out at the night sky and see hundreds of objects floating in our universe, 90% of our universe is empty space. Why is it we give so little attention to the largest aspect of our universe—the space between the objects?

Eckhart Tolle writes in his latest book, A New Earth:

“The arising of space consciousness is the next stage in the evolution of humanity.”

Just this morning, I sat in church listening to a wonderful, brilliant man struggle with defining who or what God is. He alluded to words that offered, “although I can’t tell you exactly what God is, I’ll know it when I see it.”

I would offer, rather, we know it when we feel it. Our physical eyes cannot know infinity.

When I look out at the stars at night...I, too, struggle to find words. The reason is because the God we seek does not come with the mere observation of objects. It cannot be named because there is nothing it is not and it is more than we can comprehend. It is found in the awareness of no-thingness. In trying to give it a name, we are limited to only what we know, but a part of us realizes it is so much more than that. When we are drawn into speechless awe, that is when we know God best.

Tolle goes on to describe this with precision and ease as he writes:

“When the eye finds nothing to see, that no-thingness is perceived as space. When the ear finds nothing to hear, that no-thingness is perceived as stillness. When the senses, which are designed to perceive form, meet an absence of form, the formless consciousness that lies behind perception and makes all perception, all experience, possible, is no longer obscured by form. When you contemplate the unfathomable depth of space or listen to the silence in the early hours just before sunrise, something within you resonates with it as if in recognition. You then sense the vast depth of space as your own depth, and you know that precious stillness that has no form to be more deeply who you are than any of the things that make up the content of your life.”

Our struggle to define what or who God is lies in the inability to contain infinity within a single object. We want to interact with the formless as if it were form, and we want to give it a name. It isn't possible, although there are those who have tried. I've often been told that Christ Jesus was God in human form. "Yes," I agreed, "but God was also in John, Judas, Pilate, and the high priests. God was in the mountains and seas, valleys and rivers. God was on earth and in the stars, and is in everything seen and unseen throughout eternity. There is no time, no place where God is not. Infinity can never be confined to any one place or time. When we try to define God as this or that, it is no longer this or that. It is much more. Words used to label something necessarily restrict and limit it. We say God is everywhere...but as humans, being...we cannot know the depth of that awareness. The closest we can come to knowing who or what God is comes during the times when our minds are unable to produce the words to name it.

I hope you take some time to go out and look up at the night sky. Feel the majesty and wonder that moves you beyond words. Know how intrinsically united you are with it as you are lost in the inability to define and describe it. There is no name for that moment. It is. There is no name for the one who becomes aware of the awareness that provides the canvas. God is...not a noun.
