PURIFICATION

“While some people, today, are making a deliberate effort to purify, there are many more for whom this development is taking place without conscious intention, due to the intensification of spiritual light on the Earth. As those aspects of consciousness that are not aligned with light are uprooted from body, mind, and emotions, they begin releasing into awareness, bringing new understandings and experiences on all levels of being. Some of these experiences are uplifting, some difficult to sustain. The process of clarifying and releasing on all levels, based on the action of light, allows the soul greater access to the outer personality-self, and forms the foundation and fundamental process of purification.

Light is also the Intelligence of God, conveying truth, love, and inspiration to the consciousness of mankind. Its purpose, to reveal a new vision and awareness of sacred reality to humanity so that mankind can live in direct and conscious relationship with the Source of life.

In the presence of the holy, all doubt vanishes. In the presence of the pure, all fear vanishes and only innocence remains. It is the goal of purification to return each self to the conditions of purity and innocence so that the natural love of the heart can find its way into expression again, and so that the wounds of the past, however deep they may be, can be healed in the balm of Love's gracious presence, emerging eternally from the holy Source of life.” (Julie Redstone)

Ahhhh...the summer of 2009. One I will likely NEVER forget!

The third (and hopefully final) straw occurred on July 20, amid one of the worst droughts and hottest summers we've ever known in South Texas. This particular day, the temperatures were about 100 degrees, yet again, but a chance of rain lurked in distant clouds.

I stood there in the doorway of my house, unable to verbalize what I saw. The only thing I could do was laugh, most likely due to the shock I was in. Everything in my home was covered with a powdery chemical substance...nothing was untouched. I soon noticed a piercing, screaming sound coming from both upstairs and downstairs. It took only moments to realize it was the return air conditioner vents. They were completely clogged with the dust, because the exterminator forgot to turn off the units. I quickly shut them off.

By instinct, I told my daughter not to come inside, but to stay on the porch with the dog. I robotically started carrying items to the outside patio. I filled the sink with warm water and cleanser, and grabbed a wash cloth to start cleaning. It took four tries to get the powdery substance off the kitchen island, but once I had an area to place the items on, I started bringing them back inside, one by one, rinsing and scrubbing and then laying things out to dry.

I had called and done my best to tell my husband, Billy, what I was seeing, and about an hour later, he walked through the door with two shop vacs in tow. He, too, immediately went into shock! It was only then he realized I wasn't exaggerating.

As Billy vacuumed the entry and living room floors—first with one vacuum cleaner, and then with another, I continued doing what I could to find some sense in what was happening in the only way I knew how. Cleaning. It wasn't long, however, we looked at each other and realized...the task was far bigger than us. Over two hours had now passed since Billy arrived, and we both started to slow down enough to realize we had numb lips and prickling sensations all over our faces and arms. My head had started pounding, and my lungs felt hot and heavy.

As the saga continued, we ended up in a hotel, with nothing but the clothes on our backs, struggling with what had happened. The owner of the exterminating company called, and wanted to meet us at the house, so we drove back and allowed him to take a look for himself. He, too, was shocked. It wasn't long before we all started feeling some numbness, so we agreed to meet in the morning, with him profusely apologizing and promising to take care of our hotel expenses.

It was late when we got settled back in at the hotel. Dayna, our 14-year-old, had gone to stay with a friend for the night, and Billy and I took out our laptops and began to research the chemicals that were listed on the receipt. It didn't look good, but we knew there was much more to learn. For the first time in years, that night, I noticed I had horrible indigestion, but was so exhausted, I collapsed into bed, in hopes it would be gone the next day. It wasn't.

As the next few days passed, the nightmare grew progressively worse. With the dawn of light, we finally understood our entire home was now contaminated. Everything had to be cleaned...and I do mean everything!

We were allowed to pick out 2 weeks worth of clothing, and were told they would have those back to us in about 4 days. Meanwhile...we had no clothes, no toiletries, nothing. Well, we did have our laptop computers. That was a blessing.

The next afternoon, we began an "extended stay" at a hotel in San Marcos, and watched our once spotless and beautiful home being invaded by all kinds of strangers, each performing some type of duty to purify the now toxic environment.

After a couple of unsuccessful tries at cleaning everything, a moving van arrived, and hauled off all the belongings we owned, and the entire house was washed, from ceiling to floor. The air ducts were cleaned. Large air purifiers were now running 24 hours a day, blasting the inside air into the outer world.

Three times I tried to go back to the house to check on things, but with each visit, the horrible side effects returned. The indigestion was now so awful, I was taking the Nexium my husband had. Finally, I gave up and called my doctor and he put me back on my own prescription. Meanwhile, the lung issue remained. I visited an allergist who told me there was little they could do other than treat the effects (congestion, headaches, chest pain). She gave me three more prescriptions and a card to a local pulmonologist...sadly saying, "There is probably little anyone can do to help you." She wrote down on the paper "post lung damage due to chemical exposure." While away from the house, I recovered after a few days, but once subjected to it, it started again. I now was starting to realize I appeared to be "allergic" to my own home. I later came to know this is known as being hypersensitive.

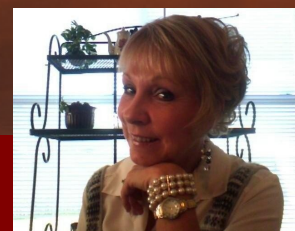

My life had been turned upside down, but I knew better than to come from emotional distress. I was tapping and contemplating every single event of the summer.

I took out a piece of paper, and began to list words to describe what had happened. I started to see patterns, and as I did this, I asked myself who or what this reminded me of. It became clear almost instantly. I could trace this back to June of 1968. I put the date into Gregg Braden's Time Code Calculator. It first projected 1995. I knew the significance of that, and I shook my head in disbelief. I put that date in, clicked on the calculator, and WHAM...it projected July 2009!! Wow!

At that point, however, I had to do one more thing. I had to find my own link to this. Where had I done this to someone in my early life.

Without going on and on, suffice it to say that the number 3 kept showing up in all this. I realized this was about the age my brother was when I started tormenting him. I remembered how I used to call him a "pest." Imagine my surprise when I also recalled how I used to put him in the closet and "exterminate" him by pretending he was a dog with rabies who had to be killed. Bingo!

So....as I traced all this back to the seed event, I recognized had I not had each event happen just as it did, I would not have been able to trace this back to the origin of the disaster.

So, you might be wondering, how am I handling all this? Well, I am calm, curious, and contemplative. LOL I am obviously in a place where I have released trying to control, but have also seen this as the release of all attachment to outcome. I have often invited Pure Consciousness to reside in my form, and I believe it first requires the ultimate purification process. To be authentic and egoless, one must first release anything that doesn't reflect true Being. One by one, I have let go of everything that wasn't aligned with Highest Good. In the end, that meant giving up everything except my family and friends...and my little dog. To devote oneself to the ultimate Source requires purification by fire, sometimes.

I have so often noticed how many enlightened Beings have let go of all material possessions in order to begin anew. In true surrender, one does not question such acts, but merely follows in absolute trust. (There was another incident that involved the sign of seven stags, but we will leave that for another time.)

I have learned a lot about trust, this summer. I have learned, most of all, to trust my instincts. In every case, my instincts were right. This is what I teach. Trust those intuitions...those nudges...those "gut feelings." How appropriate that indigestion would return to remind me, huh? When I follow my own advice, it never leads me astray. When I don't, I, too, find myself in unfamiliar, toxic environments.

Most of all, I learned to stop trying to control. To surrender and be. When one has no way to plan or organize an unknown future, all that is left is to stay in the present.

My friends have said I am now in the “dark forest.” I wait here, calmly, quietly and strongly. They will come for me. They have made that clear. My only job now is to stand calm and to remember what great power watches over me.

The unknown has become familiar. I have no option but to release space/time. The only honest reply I can give in response to questions about my future is... “I don’t know.” And isn’t that the only answer any of us can give about what lies in the future? To answer otherwise is self-deception.

Alas...there is great reward in living in the realm of the unknown. There is ultimate peace. If I cannot plan or know the future, there is no more worry. I can only contemplate what is happening in this moment. The space grows wider between thoughts. The stillness becomes intoxicating. At long last, I reside in the space between and sense my essence there. I no longer identify with a human body as a self...I am lingering in The Field that operates it. I watch. I wait. From a distance, the chaotic nonsense of everyday life seems so insignificant and mundane. The chasm widens between the physical and non-physical. In the world...not of it. Never have I better understood the experience of Being The Observer.

And ever so gently...the stillness is brushed by the presence of another beside me. We have no words for one another. We just know and we nod in recognition of the new arrival.

“What should we do?” a newcomer whispers in confusion of simple being.

“Just wait,” I reply. “There is nothing else to do. Just wait. Practice being. You will adjust.”

Moments pass, and the all-too-familiar question arises, “So, do you have any idea when you will move back into your house?”

I smile. “I don’t know.” This is not mine to know or understand. This is my opportunity to follow in absolute faith. It feels like it will all be okay, however. How do I know? I don’t know.

In our lightweight shells once known as the self, we feel Consciousness expanding...far too great to be limited to a human form. It is all so very strange and foreign, yet not frightening at all. Somehow we know...we know that we don’t know, and yet...

Ignorance is BLISS!

Using Meta-ET (TM), we understand how our inner beliefs are mirrored in the 3-D world that appears to be around and outside us. We recognize how and why our disconnection beliefs show up as problems and diseases in our bodies, as well. Tapping on the meridian points, while focusing on the issue of disconnection, we release the energy of that block, allowing limiting, non-serving beliefs to fall away.
